Until recently, students at our school had to keep their smartphones in their bags during class. Last year, however, the school began allowing students to use their phones in some lessons to look up information and take photos of their work.

Teachers have noticed some benefits. According to a survey of 30 teachers, 21 said that students can now find information more quickly during group work. Students can also record experiments in science class and watch them again later.

Of course, phones can also be a distraction. Some students check messages or play games when they should be studying, and a few teachers say it is hard to see what every student is doing on a small screen.

Therefore, clear rules are necessary. In my opinion, phones should be used only when the teacher says so, and students should help make the rules. Used in the right way, a smartphone can be a useful tool rather than a problem.

次の記事（“Cashless Payment at the School Festival”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

Last year, our school festival tried something new: visitors could pay at food stands with a smartphone app instead of cash. The student council wanted to know whether this change was a good idea, so it asked 150 visitors and 60 student staff members to answer a short questionnaire.

The results were mostly positive. Of the visitors, 72% said that paying with the app was faster, and the staff no longer had to count coins at the end of the day. One staff member said, "It saved us at least an hour of work."

On the other hand, not everyone was happy. Some older visitors did not have the app, so they had to wait in a separate line to pay in cash. A few stands also had trouble when the Internet connection became slow in the afternoon.

I believe cashless payment should continue at this year's festival, but cash should still be accepted. That way, the festival can become more convenient without leaving anyone out.

次の記事（“A Meat-Free Day in the Cafeteria”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

This spring, our school cafeteria started a "meat-free day" every Wednesday. On that day, all the lunch menus are made without meat. The cafeteria staff say they wanted students to try a wider variety of vegetables and beans.

There are good reasons for this idea. Producing meat generally uses more land and water than producing vegetables, so eating less meat can reduce the burden on the environment. The cafeteria also reports that its costs on Wednesdays are about 10% lower.

Not all students are pleased, however. In a class survey, 14 of 32 students said they feel hungry by the afternoon on Wednesdays, and the number of lunches sold on that day fell by about 20% in the first month.

I think the meat-free day is a good start, but the menus need to be improved. If the cafeteria asks students for ideas and offers filling dishes such as bean curry, more students will look forward to Wednesdays.

次の記事（“Learning From Older Neighbors”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

Many young people today rarely talk with elderly people outside their own families. To change this, our school started an exchange program with a nearby care home two years ago. Once a month, about 20 students visit the home and spend an afternoon with the residents.

The program has had clear results. The students learn traditional games and songs, and the residents often share stories about how the town looked 60 years ago. In a survey after the first year, 90% of the participating students said they wanted to continue.

Still, the program is not easy to run. Students are busy with club activities and tests, so it is sometimes hard to find enough volunteers. Some students also feel nervous because they do not know what to talk about.

I think schools in other areas should also try programs like this. Short guides with conversation topics could help nervous students, and even one visit a month can build a bridge between generations.

次の記事（“Bringing Life Back to the Shopping Street”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

The old shopping street near our station used to be full of people. Today, however, 12 of its 40 shops are closed, and many residents drive to a large shopping mall instead. Some people say the street has no future.

Last year, a group of high school students decided to help. With the shop owners, they held a monthly market where local farmers sell vegetables and students sell handmade goods. They also made a map of the street and shared it online.

The market has brought more visitors. The shop owners counted about 1,500 people at the market in March, compared with about 600 on ordinary weekends. However, the number of visitors on other days has not changed much.

I believe the students' work shows that the street still has value. To keep it alive, the town should support events like the market and help new shops open in the empty buildings.

The results were mostly positive. Of the visitors, 72% said that paying with the app was faster, and the staff no longer had to count coins at the end of the day. One staff member said, "It saved us at least an hour of work."

On the other hand, not everyone was happy. Some older visitors did not have the app, so they had to wait in a separate line to pay in cash. A few stands also had trouble when the Internet connection became slow in the afternoon.

I believe cashless payment should continue at this year's festival, but cash should still be accepted. That way, the festival can become more convenient without leaving anyone out.

The old shopping street near our station used to be full of people. Today, however, 12 of its 40 shops are closed, and many residents drive to a large shopping mall instead. Some people say the street has no future.

Last year, a group of high school students decided to help. With the shop owners, they held a monthly market where local farmers sell vegetables and students sell handmade goods. They also made a map of the street and shared it online.

The market has brought more visitors. The shop owners counted about 1,500 people at the market in March, compared with about 600 on ordinary weekends. However, the number of visitors on other days has not changed much.

I believe the students' work shows that the street still has value. To keep it alive, the town should support events like the market and help new shops open in the empty buildings.

次の記事（“A Meat-Free Day in the Cafeteria”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

This spring, our school cafeteria started a "meat-free day" every Wednesday. On that day, all the lunch menus are made without meat. The cafeteria staff say they wanted students to try a wider variety of vegetables and beans.

There are good reasons for this idea. Producing meat generally uses more land and water than producing vegetables, so eating less meat can reduce the burden on the environment. The cafeteria also reports that its costs on Wednesdays are about 10% lower.

Not all students are pleased, however. In a class survey, 14 of 32 students said they feel hungry by the afternoon on Wednesdays, and the number of lunches sold on that day fell by about 20% in the first month.

I think the meat-free day is a good start, but the menus need to be improved. If the cafeteria asks students for ideas and offers filling dishes such as bean curry, more students will look forward to Wednesdays.

次の記事（“Should Schools Start Later?”）を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

Many high school students in our town say they feel sleepy in the morning. In a survey of 400 students at three local high schools, 68% answered that they sleep less than seven hours on school nights. Some people now suggest that schools should start classes 30 minutes later.

Supporters of a later start point out that teenagers tend to become sleepy later at night than adults do. If classes begin later, students can get more sleep without changing their bedtime. One school in the survey tried starting at 9:00 a.m. for one month, and the number of students who arrived late dropped from 25 to 9.

However, a later start also creates problems. Club activities would end later, and some students would have to go home after dark. Parents who drive their children to school might also have trouble because of their work schedules.

In my view, a later start is worth trying, but each school should first talk with students and parents. A small change in the timetable could make a big difference to students' health, as long as everyone's needs are considered.

Until recently, students at our school had to keep their smartphones in their bags during class. Last year, however, the school began allowing students to use their phones in some lessons to look up information and take photos of their work.

Teachers have noticed some benefits. According to a survey of 30 teachers, 21 said that students can now find information more quickly during group work. Students can also record experiments in science class and watch them again later.

Of course, phones can also be a distraction. Some students check messages or play games when they should be studying, and a few teachers say it is hard to see what every student is doing on a small screen.

Therefore, clear rules are necessary. In my opinion, phones should be used only when the teacher says so, and students should help make the rules. Used in the right way, a smartphone can be a useful tool rather than a problem.

Many young people today rarely talk with elderly people outside their own families. To change this, our school started an exchange program with a nearby care home two years ago. Once a month, about 20 students visit the home and spend an afternoon with the residents.

The program has had clear results. The students learn traditional games and songs, and the residents often share stories about how the town looked 60 years ago. In a survey after the first year, 90% of the participating students said they wanted to continue.

Still, the program is not easy to run. Students are busy with club activities and tests, so it is sometimes hard to find enough volunteers. Some students also feel nervous because they do not know what to talk about.

I think schools in other areas should also try programs like this. Short guides with conversation topics could help nervous students, and even one visit a month can build a bridge between generations.
