次の英文を読んで、あとの問いに答えなさい。

Most of us try hard to avoid failure. (1) It is often not failure itself that we fear, but how others see us when we fail. As a result, many people choose easy tasks that they are sure to complete, rather than difficult ones from which they could learn more.

However, some educators argue that we should (2) treat failure as information. When an experiment does not work, a scientist does not decide that she is a bad scientist. Instead, she sees the result as a sign of what to try next.

In one study, students who were taught to think of mistakes as part of learning worked longer on difficult problems than students who were not, and in the end they achieved higher scores. The lesson is clear: if we can stop worrying about how we look, failure can become one of our best teachers.
